WAYS OF THE WORLD

We women are beginning to pay the malty of our greatness, and our plat-em of rights spelled with a capital R, at our slogans of "Up and make your ants known." We have had a trewants known." dousands of years of unlightened life.

What we do, our children do. Their mother's progress has set them ahead a round dozen of years in the bittermasses of existence, and their little positively necessary that I should have that dress. The voice was weighty with the importance of its statement, as the seven-year-old gravely scrutinized a doll as large as herself clothed in a gown which is an exponent of the Liliputians' modes.

It was a faint hint of an 1830 gown such as we older children think ourselves bleet to wear; the flacet and whitest of muslin entered into its composition in an intricate manner. I can describe from memory of the funny little scene. The skirt quite concealed the kid-shod feet of the envied doll, and was most admirably full. Five flounces composed it to the walst, which was tucked under the arms, five flounces each edged with an inch-wide ruffle of pure white lace. The waist, what there each edged with an inch-wide ruffle of pure white lace. The waist, what there was of it, consisted of tucked yoke, overlaid with lace and wound about be-basis in this have of the alligen as a bird in the mps of the am. One day size walked past my window in a gown of west. A gown which derived its being from the fame of the suther wicked denous at present tending on the nest of Paris—is belle Loie Faller. Thoughly as the idea of shifting "ser-The name of Paris.—In belle Loie Palier.

The name of the idea of sinfting "serpention" colors was carried out, it was, severtheless, scarcely a pretty sight to see a child so clad. The long, loose slip of woat, hang from the shoulders, was a changeable lemon yellow and pale pink, closely gathered until it spread at the sun almost after the manner of accordion plaits. Well over the shoulders fell a broad yoke of lace, fitted into a high collar at the throat and aprend into fan-shaped plaits at the shoulders. Laid upon the collar yoke were rows of mild pink wood, which met in a sloping curve. The tot's electes were hig allow paffs tied about with pink ribbens. The hat was a white straw beneath. Shoes were tan itd, stapped across the instep.

Still another contame—I suppose the weed is not too dignified—in an indoor affair of pink laws. The central point seems to be a square of lovely white embroidery fitted as a decellete yoke, from which depends a tunic to the kness. There another band of embroidery fitted as a decellete yoke, from which depends a tunic to the kness. There another band of embroidery fitted as a decellete yoke, from which depends a tunic to the kness. There another band of embroidery fitted as a decellete yoke, from which depends a tunic to the kness. There another band of embroidery about four inches deep.

A madame who imports and makes by hand gowns for girls reveals this design for one of four years. A princess frock of blue batiste, trimmed with white lace and entir ribbons to match the body color. The waist all around is guthered to the form by three rich long plaits, making a kind of corselet. Bow and end of ribbon tied at the hip, and another as the middle of waist behind where the fronk is fastened. A double collarette of lace is drawn to the throat and reaches fluffly over the aboulders. A band of lace let fit to the skirt above three tucks trims that part of the garmant.
